Some of the routines explained in the included tutorial:

Thought-of Card: You show 5 cards to your spectator and ask them to mentally choose and memorize one. After a magical gesture, one card vanishes and turns blank — it's exactly the card the spectator had in mind.

Oil and Water: You shuffle the deck and take out 3 red cards and 3 black cards. You alternate them to mix red and black cards. Magically, the red and black cards separate. After repeating the experiment a second time, the entire deck separates with red cards on one side and black cards on the other.

Printing: You start by showing a completely blank card (front and back), then ask the spectator to name any queen. Once the card is named, you take the blank card and magically make the face of the chosen queen appear. To finish, you magically print the back of the card, which can then be handed out for examination.

Fusion: Two cards are freely chosen by the audience. With a magical gesture, the two cards fuse into one. After the audience examines the fused card, you magically separate them back into the original two cards.

Change: You show a prediction card with a different back before starting. The spectator chooses a card, but it doesn't match your prediction. You then insert your prediction card into the deck, leaving it slightly protruding. The card visually transforms into the spectator's chosen card, which can be handed out for examination.

4 in 1: Four cards are freely selected by the audience, and you reveal that they are the four fours (spades, hearts, clubs, and diamonds). You then take a special card with a different back and a blank face and place it on top of the four cards. After a few seconds, the card prints and reveals the four indices of the fours.
